Her maternal grandfather was that ascounding combination, an English Lord, who was also a painter, a poet and a graceful and whimsical addrer of women. pictures, politics, society, everything!" It is from these founts of heredity that Julie Le Breton's personality was born, and the subtleness of such a temperament is presented by Mrs. Ward with the most delicate strokes of character drawing.

Of the dramatic qualities of "Lady Rose's Daughter" it may only be said that they bring into evidence a more genuine gift for story-telling proper than has heretofore been manifested by this writer, successful though she has already been. The three-cornered love affair of Julie Le Breton,

Jacob Delafield and Captain Warkworth is admirably conceived and handled with great effectiveness, the rescue of Julie by Dela-

It is more than likely that "Lady Rose's Daughter" will prove to be the most popular of Mrs. Humphrey Ward's novels. This plains the fact of Julie Le Breton's irresistible appeal to those whom she met and fascinated as Lady Henry's companion and general utility woman. A hint of the secret's nature is given in the first chapter, once by Lady Henry herself in her talk with Sir Wilfred Bury and again when Sir Wilfred suddayly beholds the face of old "The Turquoise Cup" and "The Desby Arthur Cosslett Smith, Are Well Worth While. The Cardinal Archbishop of Venice in women and challenging to most men." It is then that a flash of the truth comes to Sir Wilfred and a keen suspicion to the mind of the reader, "Of course! Of course." Mr. Arthur Cosslett Smith's novelette, "The Turquelse Cup." published this week by the Scribners, is very like the kindly and humorous prelate whom we all loved in Mr. Henry Harland's novel of two years says the Englishman, recalling Lady Henry's words, "She is not like her mother, but she has all the typical points of her ago, "The Cardinal's Snuff-Box."

Also does the turquoise cup, from which the new story takes its name, suggest the the new story takes its name, suggest the snuff-box of Mr. Harland's story, inasmuch as it is the instrument, in the Cardinal's hands, of bringing two fond hearts together. The only difference is that, in the one case, a Cardinal employes a snuff-box in Cupid's service of his own volition, while, in the other, the utilization of a turquoise cup is forced upon him my the heroine's determination to possess that beautiful treasure of his church, even if her sweetheart gets himself into all sorts And it is in her racial inheritance that her sweetheart gets himself into all sorts of trouble by securing it for her.

Nevertheless, Mr. Smith's story makes pleasant reading and is told in a very deft and attractive manner. Its characters are few, but they are of the light-comedy school and we like them and enjoy their ways. The Cardinal much be viewed. ways. The Cardinal must be viewed as the central figure of the little romance, but he does not dominate at the expense of the other members of the cast. Lady Nora Daiy, a dazzling and joyous Irish noblewoman, is the heroine, and a very charm-ing heroine she makes. The Earl of Vaux-hall-"Bobby," to his friends-is the hero, and he wins our sympathies by the honesty of his great loye for Lady Nora and by his British inability to follow the varia-tions of her exuberant Celtic spirits. Mr.

Phelim Blake, cousin to Lady Nora and very much in love with her, in a laugh-ingly hopeless way, is a dashing Irish gen-tleman who recalls the handsome and reckiesa Irishmen so plentiful in Lever's lovels. And as for Miss O'Kelly, the Lady Nora's aunt and chaperone, she is an Irishwoman of quality whom you couldn't help but like. These are the principal characters in Mr.

Smith's story and they play their part very acceptably in a sunlit comedy under Venetian skips. As for the story itself, the part played by the turquoise cup, and why the Cardinal Archbishop was led to make use of it for the greater happiness of "Bobby," Earl of Vauxhall, and the Lady Nora Daly it wouldn't be quite fair to tell you that. It is permissable, however, to refer you to the book itself, which will furnish an hour's good entertainment.

When you have finished this one story, you will encounter another, "The Desert," bound between the same covers, and you are at once transported from the richness and beauty of Venice to the forbidding deso-lation of Sahara. In the latter story, Mr. Smith seems to have depicted with con-siderable skill and faithfulness, the life of which he tells. It is a melodramatic story, with the happlest of endings, and its action takes place within the time-limit of a cara-van journey from the little casis of El Merb to the military post of Briskra, an important desert market.

The story is simply told and the details of a caravan journey across the desert are presented with much vividness. The plot contains a mystery which keeps the read-er's interest keen to the very end, and the solution then reached is dramatically conestent and satisfactory. Mr. Smith has a clear and natural literary style. His judg-ment of dramatic values is accurate, a fact made evident in "The Desert," while "The Turquoise Cup" testifies to his apprecia-tion of comedy and his possession of the lightness of touch necessary to the telling of a frankly inconsequential and amusing was encouraged in her purpose by Mrs. Ger-trude Atherton.

In "The Socialist and the Prince" Mrs. Fremont Older Tells a Story of the Anti-Chinese Riots in San Franciaco.

The novel by Mrs. Older has for its theme the San Francisco riots which grew out of the agitation against Chinese cheap labor, and for its hero a sort of idealized and mysterious Dennis Kearney, famous at that time for his "sand lot" eloquence and his persistent cry of "The Chinese must This hero, Stryne, is an unknown man, whose childhood was spent among the gypties and whose mature years are given up to socialistic work and to denunciation of the rich and fortunate ones of life. He is the head of the anti-Chinese movement in the story, as was Dennis Kearney in real life. But, unlike Kearney, he is a man of polished manners upon occasion and is so drawn as to suggest an aristocrat in disguise. The character will doubtless attract the fancy of readers who relish a strong duch of melodrama and of picturesque pos-Mrs. Older's book is interesting in a way, but would have been more forcible and con-vincing if, with such a theme as was chosen, she had kept more closely to the real peo ple, who figured in the movement of which she tells. Stryne does not impress one as a vital figure, nor does such a character as the Prince Ruspoll, cousin to his Majesty. King Humbert of Italy, seem naturally a part of such a story or its environment. Nevertheless, he is almost the leading Nevertheless, he is almost the leading masculine character, triumphing over Stryne for the love of the wealthy Theocosia Peyton, an incorrigible and somewhat thresome little coquette whom he finally makes the Princess Ruspoll, and, being "in at the death" of Stryne when the latter is killed while leading a socialist rebellion in Rome. The author of "The Socialist and the Prince" can do better than she has done with in this novel. She has a terse and dramatic narrative style, but in the present instance she has allowed her story to run away with her, and surrendered too largely to a predilection for theatric characters.

JOHN STRANGE WINTER'S "MARTY." A Novel Which Presents the Problem a Fairly Interesting and Readable

John Strange Winter, a successful writer who, as many readers know, is not a "John" at all, but belongs to the feminine gender, has added another to her long list of novels. After reading "Marty" one inclines to believe, erroneously, that the author belongs to the singular number; for it is difficult to realize that woman could have written such a story of married life. Not that there is wholly wanting an insight to the matrimonial relation—but the heroine is made of stuff suggesting the substance of a sentimental spin-ster's dreams. Yet there is a certain flesh and blood about Marty which endears her in spite of the fact that she behaves as no real wife would.

signed for charte ears. The problem is sim-ple—can young people of different social rank wisely afford to intermarry? The question is answered rather comfortably for the reader, but in a manner which involves strained, uncomfortable and un-natural behavior by the heroine. In spite of the story's defects it has the "interesting" quality, Having begun it the reader is impelled to finish. The author per-fectly understands the value of suspended

Interest, which element of the story-teller's art she has deftly employed.

The book is written by a practiced hand, yet apparently written in great haste. The amenities of style are seemingly ignored. Prolixity and verbosity, ipevitable in hasty work, abound to such an extent that they would seem to have irresistibly drawn forth the blue pencil of an editor. A little of the philosophy is trite and banal, and is inserted at such length, now and then, that the reader impatiently turns the page to meet the story's neglected thread, (Lippin-

An event of interest to Christian people of many denominations is the publication this week by the Baker & Taylor Co. New York, of "Leavening the Nation," by Reverend Doctor J. B. Clark, editorial retary of the Congregational Home Missionary Society. Owing to the lack of literature on the subject, and because of his special fitness for the task, Doctor Clark was invited to tell the story of American home missions. In his work he had the assistance of the secretaries of mission boards of other denominations, and the result is a standard, nonsectarian history of home mis-sion endeavor, which, it is believed, will be of absorbing interest to multitudes of Christian people of all denominations.
